Research

I use network science and machine learning tools to evaluate the effects of corporate influence on policy-making. Building on a wealth of research that focuses on lobbying and campaign finance, I explore complementary avenues of corporate influence, which can take the form of network graphs. I am currently analysing the involvement of corporations from the food & beverage, alcohol and tobacco industries in funding scientific research that advances their interests. I also demonstrate how corporations use this research to advise agencies on regulatory decision-making. My work ultimately exposes the political clout of special interest groups as an intricate, multi-layered network of corporate influence.
